THE SHADOW FROM THE HILLS

By A. E. HUDSON.

Two children played on the banks of the Sciota through the long summer day, their voices blending with the sweet notes of the robins in the willows.

Waving fields of grain stretched away to the eastern horizon, divided by zig-zag rail fence, and sinuous lines of dark foliage that grew by the smaller streams. Along the river bank lay the turnpike to Columbus, flanked by the white cottages of a scattered village,

Facing the willows stood a cottage with a little porch almost hidden by the profuse bloom of a beautiful climbing rose.

Long and happily the children played together until, wearying a little, they seated themselves upon a log that projected over the water, splashing the ripples with their little bare feet while they chatted merrily.

Suddenly the elder child caught sight of the roses that grew at his mothers door and he brought one and laid it in the lap of his playmate. She caressed it for a time with a child's ecstasy of pleasure and then, her brown eyes sparkling with mischief, held it out over the water and dropped it, watching the while, the queer look that played over the face of the lad.

Just a moment she watched the cloud of pain and then stooped to regain the flower but to late; The current had borne it beyond her reach, Then the shadow of a cloud came out of the west and changed the river from a silver to a leaden gray.

A tall lad and a brown eyed maiden stood in the gloom of the willows while the October shadows lengthened and the sun sank into the winding river, The face of the lad was white and earnest, but that of the maiden was flushed and she affected to laugh lightly at his hot words. He, foolish boy, blinded by passion or he would have seen through the veil of mischief. But she was to playful, and he impatient, and he turned in anger and strode away.

His beacon in that hour of bitterness was the light on the tower of the government arsenal at Columbus. The girl followed him a step or two, the words was on her lips to recall him, but pride rebelled and she watched in silence till he disappeared in the deepening twilight,

Up the rugged slope of a spur of the Black Hills a detachment of soldiers were toiling arduously yet cautiously. The sweat rolled down their faces. Far below them a thin blue line was threading its way over the trail the skirmishers had left. Upward they pushed and the mountains became more black and desolate at every step but gave no sign of a lurking foe.

On through a deep ravine that opened abruptly upon a ragged table of rock.

Then as they marched out upon the little plateau, there arose upon every side a yell that was appalling in its malignant fierceness and the unseen foe poured a hail of lead upon the exposed men. For a moment they wavered, but when the clear-toned orders of their commander rang above the din, they remembered they were sons of Gettysburg. The Dakotas closed between them and their goal, sweeping down from behind every crag and boulder with exulting yells. Then came such a hand to hand fight as only desperate men can make.

(To be continued next month.)
